

2012 INTERNATIONAL Study of Consumer Knowledge & Attitudes Toward DIETARY FATS & OILS

This consumer research explores and reports global awareness of and concern for the types of fats and oils consumed in food, building on trended research conducted by Multi-sponsor Surveys in the United States. It enables comparisons of consumer attitudes and behavior across the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Japan with comparison to U.S. consumers included for selected measures. Among the topics reported are:

- Consumer knowledge and information sources
- Opinions regarding the healthfulness of various fats and oils
- Health benefits linked to healthy fats and oils
- Efforts to consume healthy fats and oils
- Factors motivating efforts to choose healthy fats/oils
- Omega-3 awareness and efforts
- Use of functional foods containing Omega-3, plant stanols or sterols
- Types of fats/oils used when preparing foods
- Health and wellness issues impacting dietary choices

REPORT EXCERPT --

Generally, no more than half of adults in any of the countries surveyed report making an effort to consume less unhealthy fats/oils and more healthy varieties, lagging behind efforts reported by U.S. consumers.
